Elizabeth Churchill, Google [SIGCHI]

Eric Adman, IBM & ACM Council/SGB [SIGMICRO]

Background

At the ACM Retreat it was pointed out that the model for technical communities in ACM dates to the 1960's and is unique among associations with Special Interest Groups (SIGs). From the beginning, ACM SIGs have had significant technical and financial autonomy within ACM. With autonomy has come significant responsibility for fostering strong communities and providing these communities with high quality technical activities, including conferences/workshops, publications, and local chapters.

Over the past 50 years, this model has proved incredibly successful for ACM. SIGs dominate the technical landscape of ACM. Many SIGs represent the preeminent community in their technical area. SIG conferences have grown in number and stature. SIG conference proceedings dominate the content and the count of downloads within the DL. Many SIGs are active beyond conferences with programs in education, professional development, and public policy.

An individual SIG is a relatively complex structure, due to its support of multiple objectives (e.g., membership, meetings, communications) and required fiduciary management of the funds supporting those activities. This heavyweight structure tends to slow down evolution of the portfolio of ACM SIGs and, thus, the complexion of the technical communities that comprise ACM. The structure also demands support from ACM, as well as the existence of a large and vibrant pool of volunteers. The opportunity cost of these demands on both staff and volunteers is hard to quantify, but unmistakable in terms of number of people and hours required and in terms of other good works foregone.

At issue is whether the current SIG model and structure:

- Provides for continued value to the membership of the SIGs
- Exerts unnecessary pressure on SIGs to conform to one model of success
- Fosters or curtails cross-SIG collaboration
- Fosters or curtails the emergence of new technical communities and activities.
- Fosters or curtails coherence across ACM technical communities
