Introduction: Energy is the driving force behind all life processes. It is the energy that powers the growth, development, and reproduction of all organisms. Energy is transferred from one trophic level to the next through feeding. The amount of energy that is transferred between trophic levels is called the energy efficiency. Energy efficiency is the ratio of the energy that is transferred between trophic levels to the energy that is available at the lower trophic level. Energy efficiency is always less than 100% because some energy is lost as heat during the transfer of energy between trophic levels. The amount of energy that is stored in an organism is called the energy storage. Energy storage is the energy that is stored in the form of chemical bonds in the molecules of the organism. Energy storage is used for growth, development, and reproduction.
