

CPR LIFE SAVING REFERENCE GUIDE

In its latest CPR guidelines, AHA (American Heart Association) has re-arranged the A-B-C to C-A-B. A-B-C or Airway- Breathing- Compressions required the responder to first open the airway to give breaths to the victim. AHA says that in this emergency, chest compressions are often critically delayed, even though the highest survival rates from cardiac arrest are reported among patients who received early chest compressions. Studies show that more than 22 percent have not saved by hands only (chest compressions) as opposed to air and/or mouthed. By updating the sequence to C-A-B or Chest-Airway-Breathing, compressions will be initiated earlier, increasing the chances of survival for many patients.

Untrained rescuers should take the Hands-Only approach

The latest AHA guidelines distinguish between an untrained bystander and a trained professional and provide steps for each type of rescuer. The previous version of the AHA guidelines (2005) only recommended that dispatchers should provide compressions-only CPR instructions to bystanders, but did not provide a different set of instructions.

According to the new recommendations if a bystander does not have any training in providing CPR for the patient, the bystander should perform compressions-only CPR also referred to as Hands-Only CPR. The AHA instructs the untrained bystander to "push hard and fast" or follow the instructions provided by the EMS dispatchers. The rescuer should operate the compressions until either responders take over or trained professionals arrive at the scene. The reason for the focus on Hands-Only CPR is because it is easier for dispatchers to provide instructions on the phone and untrained responders find it easier to perform it.

Depth of compression set at 2 inches for adults

The latest AHA guidelines instruct responders that the "adult sternum should be depressed at least 2 inches." This is a shift from the previous version of the guidelines which defined the depth of compressions to be approximately 1 1/2 to 2 inches. Compressions directly pump the heart and create blood flow in the arteries, providing oxygen to the brain and heart. The guidelines decided to provide one compression depth to avoid any confusion for rescuers and to make sure they push hard which they usually fail to do so. Also, recent studies found that compressions 2 inches deep were more effective than compressions that were only 1 1/2 inches deep.

Removal of "Look, Listen and Feel"

Previously the AHA recommended that the responder "Look, Listen, and Feel" after the airway was opened to make sure that the patient is breathing. Now, in the latest AHA guidelines, the rescuer has to open the patient's airway and deliver two breaths after mouth to mouth or 30 compressions on the patient's chest.

Routine use of Cricald pressure discontinued

The latest AHA CPR guidelines have discontinued the routine use of cricald pressure during ventilation. Cricald pressure is a technique of applying pressure to reduce the risk of regurgitation and aspiration. The previous edition of the AHA guidelines used to suggest the use of Cricald pressure if the victim was "deeply unconscious." However, a search of recent studies found that use of this technique did not actually improve ventilation. Moreover, it is not an easy technique to master and it is difficult to adequately train rescuers. Therefore, the latest set of instructions coming from the AHA say that the routine use of Cricald pressure is not recommended.
