

Chapter 3

1. Explain how Occam's razor is used to justify nominalism.

Nominalism is the idea that our knowledge of universal concepts or abstract things is merely a label or name that we use to organize our sensory experience. It does not correspond to anything that is real. The concept exists only within us. Occam's razor is a philosophical tool that states that the simplest argument, with the fewest assumptions, is a better argument. Nominalism requires the fewest assumptions because it makes no claims about an external reality that cannot be directly known.

2. Define primary and secondary qualities, and explain how these terms imply a mind-body dualism.

Primary qualities are the properties of objects as they exist in the universe. Secondary qualities are the properties of objects as they appear to us. Thus, primary qualities are physical, and secondary qualities are psychological. If the two kinds of qualities are not identical, then that implies that the physical and psychological worlds are separate, distinct and different, and that is dualism.

3. Explain the difference between essential qualities and particular qualities.

Essential qualities define the identity of an object, while the particular qualities make it unique. Or, essential qualities are what items in the same category have in common, while particular qualities are what each item in a category has uniquely.

4. Explain the difference between exaggerated realism and moderate realism.

Realism is the idea that the universals are real and exist outside the mind. Exaggerated realism separates essences from particulars, while moderate realism argues for the co-mingling and interdependence of essences and particulars.

5. How did Platonic rationalism manage to become the dominant philosophy in Western Europe?

After the fall of the Roman empire, philosophy thrived within the monasteries of the early Catholic church, which spread Christianity throughout the continent. Early Christian theology was infused with Platonic thinking through the movement called Neoplatonism.
