Abstract—The event-driven and highly dynamic nature of JavaScript, as well as its runtime interaction with the Document Object Model (DOM) make it challenging to test JavaScript-based applications. Current web test automation techniques target the generation of event sequences, but they ignore testing the JavaScript code at the unit level. Further they either ignore the oracle problem completely or simplify it through generic soft oracles such as HTML validation and runtime exceptions. We present a framework to automatically generate test cases for JavaScript applications at two complementary levels, namely events and individual JavaScript functions. Our approach employs a combination of function coverage maximization and function state abstraction algorithms to efficiently generate test cases. In addition, these test cases are strengthened by automatically generated mutation-based oracles. We empirically evaluate the implementation of our approach, called JSEFT, to assess its efficacy. The results, on 13 JavaScript-based applications, show that the generated test cases achieve a coverage of 68% and that JSEFT can detect injected JavaScript and DOM faults with a high accuracy (100% precision, 70% recall). We also find that JSEFT outperforms an existing JavaScript test automation framework both in terms of coverage and detected faults.

I. INTRODUCTION

JavaScript plays a prominent role in modern web applications. To test their JavaScript applications, developers often write test cases using web testing frameworks such as SELENIUM (GUI tests) and QUNIT (JavaScript unit tests). Although such frameworks help to automate test execution, the test cases still need to be written manually, which is tedious and time-consuming.

Further, the event-driven and highly dynamic nature of JavaScript, as well as its runtime interaction with the Document Object Model (DOM) make JavaScript applications error-prone [1] and difficult to test.

Researchers have recently developed automated test generation techniques for JavaScript-based applications [2], [3], [4], [5], [6]. However, current web test generation techniques suffer from two main shortcomings, namely, they:

- 1) Target the generation of event sequences, which operate at the event-level or DOM-level to cover the state space of the application. These techniques fail to capture faults that do not propagate to an observable DOM state. As such, they potentially miss this portion of code-level JavaScript faults. In order to capture such faults, effective test generation techniques need to target the code at the JavaScript unit-level, in addition to the event-level.
- 2) Either ignore the oracle problem altogether or simplify it through generic soft oracles, such as W3C HTML validation [2], [5], or JavaScript runtime exceptions [2]. A generated test case without assertions is not useful since coverage alone is not the goal of software testing. For such generated test cases, the tester still needs to manually write many assertions, which is time and effort intensive. On the other hand, soft oracles target generic fault types and are limited in their fault finding capabilities. However, to be practically useful, unit testing requires strong oracles to determine whether the application under test executes correctly.

To address these two shortcomings, we propose an automated test case generation technique for JavaScript applications.

Our approach, called JSEFT (JavaScript Event and Function Testing) operates through a three step process. First, it dynamically explores the event-space of the application using a function coverage maximization method, to infer a test model. Then, it generates test cases at two complementary levels, namely, DOM event and JavaScript functions. Our technique employs a novel function state abstraction algorithm to minimize the number of function-level states needed for test generation. Finally, it automatically generates test oracles, through a mutation-based algorithm.

A preliminary version of this work appeared in a short New Ideas paper [7]. In this current paper, we present the complete technique with conceptually significant improvements, including detailed new algorithms (Algorithms 1–2), a fully-functional tool implementation, and a thorough empirical analysis on 13 JavaScript applications, providing evidence of the efficacy of the approach.

This work makes the following main contributions:

- An automatic technique to generate test cases for JavaScript functions and events.
- A combination of function converge maximization and function state abstraction algorithms to efficiently generate unit test cases.
- A mutation-based algorithm to effectively generate test oracles, capable of detecting regression JavaScript and DOM-level faults.
- The implementation of our technique in a tool called JSEFT, which is publicly available [8].
- An empirical evaluation to assess the efficacy of JSEFT using 13 JavaScript applications.

The results of our evaluation show that on average (1) the generated test suite by JSEFT achieves a 68% JavaScript code coverage, (2) compared to ARTEMIS, a feedback-directed JavaScript testing framework [2], JSEFT achieves 53% better coverage, and (3) the test oracles generated by JSEFT are able to detect injected faults with 100% precision and 70% recall.
