

Does Temperature of Kernels Affect Popcorn Yield?

5 pages | 1186 words

This experiment will attempt to determine if the temperature that popcorn kernels are stored at will affect the amount of un-popped kernels when using a hot air popcorn popper. Popcorn kernels contain moisture inside of them which, when heated, turns to steam and expands that in turn causes the kernel to explode. Popcorn.org states that loss of moisture content can cause less yield amounts when popping popcorn (popcorn.org, 2014).

Literature Review

Popcorn is a favorite snack for many. There have been many experiments done on popcorn to determine best brands, best popping method and best way to yield the most popped kernels among others. Larano compared popping results with kernels stored at different temperatures. She reported that kernels stored in the refrigerator or freezer had more un-popped kernels than those that were stored at room temperature (Larano, 2002). Boyd tested two different brands of microwave popcorn to determine which produced the least amount of un-popped kernels. While Boyd tested by popping popcorn in the microwave and using two different brands of popcorn, he did state two explanations for why popcorn kernels don't pop. One is that there is an insufficient amount of moisture in the kernel and the other that there is a crack in the hull that allows steam to escape before building up enough pressure to cause the kernel to explode (Boyd, n.d.). This experiment will focus on the difference in storing kernels at room temperature and in the freezer on the amount of un-popped kernels produced with a hot air popper.

Experimental Design Steps

Using popcorn kernels from a store brand bag of popcorn kernels (all kernels should come from the same bag): Using baggies (or jars or bowls or some similar container), make six separate groups containing 300 kernels each Place three of the groups in a freezer and leave the other three on the counter or in a cabinet at room temperature

Allow the groups to set for at least 24 hours

When ready to start the experiment, run the air popper for two minutes to warm it up Alternating between the groups placed in the freezer and the groups left at room temperature, pop each group in the air popper for two minutes into a large bowl or similar container After each group is finished popping, remove the popped kernels from the container and count the amount of un-popped kernels remaining (be sure to look in the popper for any un-popped kernels that may remain there)

Reasoning

Running the air popper for two minutes before starting the experiment should allow the popper to be at a relatively constant temperature for each group. Alternating the type of group as the experiment is performed should prevent the results from being skewed due to the popper being hotter or cooler for one group type at the beginning or end of the experiment. Sequence of Events

The amount of un-popped kernels is determined by actually counting the number of un-popped kernels left for each group. All of the...
