

1. Structural or Syntactic Calque:

yielding an unfamiliar sentence structure in the target language.

In this example, the first sentence structure is widely used in Arabic, although it is considered grammatically wrong when compared to the second.

He swore at me

هو شتم علي

هو شتمتي

3. Orthographic Calque:

yielding spellings of places, people, and ethnicities that are different from the ones used in the target language; with no consideration.

Perhaps, one of the most obvious examples today is the name 'Mohammed', which gets written differently according to each language's spelling system.

2. Typographic Calque:

yielding unfamiliar typing rules in the target language.

Example: English capitalization rules or use of quotation marks and italicization for emphasis when brought into Spanish, for example.

4. Paronymous Calque or Loan Word – also called “phony friends”:

representing the same word with the same spelling but different meanings in the two languages under translation.

Example 1: “Actual” in English means “truthful,” while in Spanish it means “present”.

Example 2: “Billion” in English means a thousand million (1000,000000), while in Spanish, it means a million million (1000000,000000).

The reason behind this is that both words are etymologically related, yet they evolved differently.
