

Chapter 1: Operations Management and Value Chains

Discussion Questions

1. Explain how the seven differences between goods and services would be applied to a major airline service. Provide airline examples that illustrate each difference.
 1. Goods are tangible, whereas services are intangible. Fuel, airline cabin food, paper tickets, pillows, magazines, sodas and coffee, and so on are the only physical goods. Ask your students: "When you pay say $300 for a ticket, how much is for "place utility" and how much for the physical goods?" Goods are consumed, but services are experienced. A senior executive of the Hilton Corporation stated, "We sell time. You can't put a hotel room on the shelf."³
 2. Customers participate in many service processes, activities, and transactions. Oh! Yes. At boarding, while in flight, leaving the plane, at the baggage terminal, and so on. Many services require that the customer be present either physically, on a telephone, or online for service to commence. In addition, the customer and service provider often co-produce a service, meaning that they work together to create and simultaneously consume the service, as would be the case between a bank teller and a customer, to complete a financial transaction. The higher the customer participation, the more uncertainty the firm has with respect to service time, capacity, scheduling, quality performance, and operating cost.
 3. The demand for services is more difficult to predict than the demand for goods. Airline routes are complicated with weather, other carrier schedules and reschedules, takeoff and landing delays, etc. making demand highly variable with no way to "store in inventory the seat" (see #4) Once the plane takes off, the revenue from an empty seat is lost forever! Customer arrival rates and demand patterns for such service delivery systems as banks, airlines, supermarkets, call centers, and courts are very difficult to forecast. The demand for services is time-dependent, especially over the short term (by hour or day). This places many pressures on service firm managers to adequately plan staffing levels and capacity.
 4. Services cannot be stored as physical inventory. Service capacity is the substitute for physical inventory such as the number of pilots, flight attendants, fuel trucks, seats, etc. In goods-producing firms, inventory can be used to decouple customer demand from the production process or between stages of the production process and ensure constant availability despite fluctuations in demand. Service firms do not have physical inventory to absorb such fluctuations in demand. For service delivery systems, availability depends on the system's capacity. For example, a hospital must have an adequate supply of beds for the purpose of meeting unanticipated patient demand, and a float pool of nurses when things get very busy. Once an airline seat, a hotel room, or an hour of a lawyer's day is gone, there is no way to recapture the lost revenue.
 5. Service management skills are paramount to a successful service encounter. Flight attendants, for example, must deal with many complex situations that require "service management" skills. Employees who interact with customers
