Fox, 2015-04-08 The past two decades of politics in Washington have seen increased partisanship prolonged stalemates and numerous scandals For today s teenagers and young adults years of ineffective and inefficient political leadership have completely eroded any sense that politicians or government have the ability to do good or effect positive change Worse the mean spirited dysfunctional political system that has come to characterize American politics has turned young people off to the idea of running for office With more than 500 000 elected positions in the United States what will happen when this generation is expected to take the reins of political power Through an original national survey of more than 4 000 high school and college students as well as more than 100 in depth interviews Jennifer L Lawless and Richard L Fox find that young Americans feel completely alienated from contemporary politics and express little ambition or aspiration to run for office in the future The overwhelming majority see nothing particularly noble about those currently in office viewing most as dishonest self interested and disinterested in helping their constituents These young people want to improve their communities and enact change in the world but they don t think politics is the way to achieve these goals In fact they look disdainfully upon the prospects of growing up to be a mayor governor senator or even president of the United States Running from Office explores young people s opinions about contemporary politics and their political ambition or lack of it The book paints a political profile of the next generation that should sound alarm bells about the long term deeply embedded damage contemporary politics has wrought on U S democracy and its youngest citizens As disheartening as their conclusions sound Lawless and Fox end with practical suggestions for how new technologies national service programs and well strategized public service campaigns could generate political ambition in young people Today s high school and college students care deeply about improving the future and it s not too late to ensure that they view running for office as an effective way to do so
