

Biology Unit 4 Key Questions

39. Name the specific type of plant tissue or cell that performs the following functions:

a) waterproofing the surface layer

The cutin is the tissue that provides waterproofing of the surface layer of a plant.

b) rapidly dividing into new cells

The meristem region of the root rapidly divides into new cells to grow the root of the plant and drives the root cap further into the ground.

c) transporting sugars throughout the plant

The phloem is a part of the vascular system in a plant and transports sugars and other nutrients from the leaves to the entire plant.

40. Maple syrup is produced from the sap moving in the xylem of maple trees in the early spring. How would taking too much sap in the spring harm the maple tree?

Maple trees need the xylem sap to create the glucose the tree needs to survive. If too much sap is removed from the tree then the tree won't be able to create enough glucose causing the tree to die.

41. A number of plants are currently being studied for use in cleaning up land sites containing toxic substances.

a) Name the technique of using plants for this purpose.

Phytoremediation is the technique in which plant life is used to clean up polluted areas.

b) Describe one way plants can clean up toxic substances.

One way plants can clean up toxic substances is the by absorption of these pollutants in the ground through the roots the converting it into a less harmful chemical in the plant.

c) List two advantages and two disadvantages of this technique.

One advantage of phytoremediation is that it requires less equipment and labour than other methods such as removal and disposal that requires workers to remove contaminated soil, or water and dispose of it in a toxic waste disposal facility. Phytoremediation only requires workers or volunteers to plant the plants required for the cleanup and make sure they get water. Another advantage of phytoremediation is that it preserves the top soil which keeps the soil fertile. With methods such as removal and disposal, any contaminated soil including top soil is removed making the land less fertile or completely infertile. One disadvantage of phytoremediation however is that phytoremediation is limited to the surface area and depth of the roots of the plants. If contaminated soil is further underground than the plant roots can go that soil will not benefit from phytoremediation. Another disadvantage of phytoremediation is the long commitment. Plants such as trees grown for phytoremediation take a long time to grow. This means that the length of time required to cleanup the area is increased and requires more commitment to see it through.

42. You are exploring the beach on a tropical island and come across a strange-looking plant that washed ashore. It has been at sea for many weeks, but still has clear features. You think it may be new to science, so you want to classify it. It has the following features:

- Long leaves with narrow blades (60 cm x 3 cm)
- Parallel veins on leaves
