

Nature vs. Nurture

Biologists' interest in nature/nurture differences really started with the 1950s. This was because the very nature of the scientific approach is to test the null hypothesis. So, if there are differences between groups, it's assumed that something is causing the difference. Since the null hypothesis is usually that there are no differences, you're usually testing to see if there are differences. So, the null hypothesis is usually that there are no differences between groups.

Biologists' interest in the fact that some behaviors are more genetic than others is because the scientific approach is to test the null hypothesis. So, if there are differences between groups, it's assumed that something is causing the difference. Since the null hypothesis is usually that there are no differences, you're usually testing to see if there are differences. So, the null hypothesis is usually that there are no differences between groups.

Conclusion:

There is a strong case for both nature and nurture, but the evidence is stronger for nature.
