

TYPES of STUDIES and DATA COLLECTION METHODS

1. Observational Study: This type of study attempts to understand a cause and effect relationship but the researcher is not able to control how the groups are assigned or the treatment each group receives. The researcher also usually attempts to minimize any influence the study may have on the subjects.
2. Experimental Study: This type of study also attempts to understand a cause and effect relationship. The researcher usually selects groups from the population and assigns treatment to one or more groups. The researcher also commonly uses a control group that receives a placebo.

Treatment Group: The group that actually receives real treatment.

Control Group & Placebo: The group that receives a fake treatment, called a placebo.

3. Simulations: A way to model random events in a statistical study, such that simulated outcomes closely match real-world outcomes in a safer or more efficient way.
4. Census: A study that uses counts or measures of the entire population.
5. Sampling: A study that selects a subset of the population to estimate the characteristics of the whole population.

Choose the type of Study that is most likely to be used (Note: each is used just once).
