

Chapter Introduction

We all love our cellphones. What would we do without them? But is it possible that they are responsible for our loss of trust in people? And when the trust is gone, what's left? Brian Bethune's piece suggests we should pause and examine our lives in light of this technology and its effects on our social interaction. His article was first published in Maclean's magazine on September 1, 2014.

*Susan Pinker knows as well as anyone what's been won and what's been lost in the modern era of personal mobility and global connections. "Our digital devices are fabulous for gaining information, for scheduling our lives, for reaching the people we want and avoiding the people we detest," says the Montreal-based developmental psychologist and author of The Village Effect: How Face-to-Face Contact Can Make Us Healthier and Happier, in an interview. "But those digital devices have not been good for human relationships, because they cannot engender trust." ❄*

That trust is what we need, Pinker argues in her narrative-rich book. She ranges over poll results and new medical research, mostly concentrated in North America but with a detour to isolated Sardinian mountain villages, where men—who, on worldwide average, die five to seven years before women—live to 100 at a rate 10 times that of just about anywhere else. The secret to that longevity, she concludes, is the same as the cost: The old men, socially wealthy and surrounded by constant (mostly female) attention, "were impossible to meet alone," she says, "because they never were." While there were undeniable health benefits for both, the way in which lives—mostly younger and female—were dedicated to the care of the elderly is virtually anathema in the modern West, where fostering independence is a primary parental goal.
