Volumetric analysis or titrimetry is quantitative method of chemical analysis. The concentration of determined component (titrant) in a solution is calculated from the consumption of standard solution of reagent (titrator) after titration. In a volumetric analysis in a process called titration standard solution B from the burette is added to the solution A until the reaction has taken place quantitatively, in stoichiometric ratio of examined solution A and volumetric solution. The equation describes the process of titration:

The termination of the chemical reaction is mostly characterized by the colour change of chemical indicator – the point of equivalence. From the consumption of used volumetric solution it is possible to determine the amount of the substance A from the sample. We must have the knowledge of qualitative of the analysed sample; only one of the particles in the sample is able to react with the volumetric solution.

We call the solutions used in titrimetry, volumetric solutions. The concentration of volumetric solutions in volumetric analysis is considered only in molar concentrations or molarity (mol/l). If there is a pure substance with a defined chemical composition after weighting, the solution with a precise concentration can be prepared accordingly. However in most cases, it is not possible, even after the analytical weighting, to prepare a volumetric solution with the precise concentration. The aberrations from the precise concentration are determined by standardized solutions with known concentration or by so called standardized substances, which solutions have always the same molar concentration after weighting. Among the standardized substances there are: oxalic acid, Na_2CO_3 , KBrO_3 etc.

Volumetric analyses are classified into these basic groups by the type of the reaction between titrator and titrant:

1. Neutralisation (protolytical, acid-base) – transfer of protons (H^+);
2. Oxidation-reduction – transfer of electrons;
3. Precipitation – formation of insoluble products;
4. Complexometric – formation of complex soluble species.

Fast chemical reaction allows the direct titration of the analysed substance. The reactions that are slower are analysed by so called back titration, where the abundance of one substance is added to the examined substance and its residual volume is titrated by the other substance.
