The values of call options decline as the strike price gets Out of The Money. These, the actual dollar amounts, are all that average options traders really see. Speculators aim to buy OTM calls and see them double if the underlying advances by a few percent.

These gambles are for the most part buyers of option contracts, purchasing calls at a premium to the stock. The fun of these games is all that seems to command their attention. Remember that these prices are only part of a snapshot - the actual prices can change quickly, making huge percent advances or losses in hours or even minutes.

The dollar amounts represented by the chart are the actual amounts that each contract would be marked for. Looking simply at the bottom line price, one would think that the near-at-the-money OTM contracts would represent the lowest risk to buy. Following the same logic, one might conclude that selling the higher-priced OTM contracts would represent the best income with the least risk. This is exactly opposite of the truth. We'll see why as we continue to progress.

More successful spread strategies involve buying a call or put with less time value, or selling a call or put with more time value.

Remember Keith's example of buying cheap and selling dear? He knew exactly when to sell for higher and lower prices on the same used cars. At one time, he could judge other than both the buy and sell price, made sense and only then would he take action.

Let's take another look at the same options. This time, we'll consider the time value.

The time value peaks At The Money (ATM) or at the strike price that's nearest to the money. Right now, the highest time value options to take advantage of selling are at the $17 and $18 strike prices. Right in between is MSFT's current stock price at the time of this snapshot: $17.50. But, tomorrow, this chart may look completely different, if MSFT trades at $15, then the highest time value will be attached at the $16 call and put.

Next we'll look at this same data from again. This time it'll be a line graph of the time value only. It'll take out the strike prices and the dollar value and smooth the lines. The time value graph of options on any asset will describe a similar bell curve.
